Recreating Sacred Space The Work of Hans Van de Bovenkamp

Since time immemorial, human beings have created “sacred space.” According to religious historian Mircea Eliade, the urge springs from the primordial depths of the psyche. Such places are necessarily set apart from daily life and the bustle of the marketplace.

Setting aside hallowed ground can be done in a variety of ways: by drawing a circle in the sand or etching it on a cathedral floor; by hanging cords and paper streamers around it or creating a gate through which you must pass in order to reach it, and by creating a “holy of holies” deep within a temple, into which only certain high priests or priestesses may go. With these “bounding” rituals, a different frame of reference or “reverence” is established, the normal doings of the world is set aside, and you can foster a sense of the divine.

As a mythologist, I recognized this same primordial impulse, the human urge to create sacred space, in the work of my friend and neighbor, Hans Van de Bovenkamp. At first, my wife, Robin, and I noticed and admired the elegant and precise way Hans created functional workshops and studios in dusty old barns and abandoned chicken coops. In the beginning, Hans did much of the labor himself. We would come to visit and find him crouched over a welder or a cement mixer, up on a ladder, or like a mad inventor, driving a rickety old crane around his towering, steel question marks. In fact, it seemed that each time Robin and I visited, we were treated to an elegant new environment, in which to lounge and taste the wonderful things of life; good food and drink—and lots of mind play—as we enticed each other into new creative visions amid paroxysms of laughter.

Because environments did transform around Hans: ramshackle buildings and weedy fields achieved a new dignity, problematic wetlands became a parkland of serpentine grass labyrinths, undulating burms, and reflecting ponds. And everywhere, in and around the studios and pavilions, his often whimsical sculptures clustered like frozen archetypes and space-age steel Moai.

Sometimes I have experienced a kind of creative vertigo around my friend's relentless self-actualization. His soul seems to be spilling over with images and ideas. I would bring him a copy of the latest book I had written, and he would show me steel creations that, with the help of derricks, would be erected in public plazas in Europe and America.

In sacred space, you must leave emptiness, for that is where the spirit can enter, like breath into the spaces between the consonants of Hebrew sacred scripture. Wisely, Hans leaves places among his sculptures to contemplate, to play, to dream.

Campbell says that traditionally sacred space functions to set aside “the normal attitude toward the cares of the world.” But Hans Van de Bovenkamp—perhaps subversively—inserts his shrine-like landmarks or “energy spots” even into the marketplace itself. For instance, his intent in placing a twenty-foot sculpture beside a thirty-story building is to humanize the architecture, minimizing its scale, and make the setting more intimate. Viewers take in a little sunyata, emptiness, with each glance at the gleaming sky-reflecting steel enigma. His sculpture-ciphers sometimes resemble the curious question marks on Buddhist stupas, such as the colossus at Bodhinath, Nepal.

Once Hans came to me to share a new idea. He wanted to create gigantic tables in the middle of nowhere, the top perhaps to be reached by a ladder, as if to a giant's dwelling, surrounded by celestial cloud shapes. The project coincided, by one of these Jungian synchronicities, with my own study of the use of mesas, symbolic tables in South American shamanism. In this tradition, the magician sets up a small table-like sanctuary, upon which he places all of his "power objects," talismans of personal power. These mesas are symbolic replicas of the cosmos; the whole world is represented on its surface.

Versions of the sacred table occur in North America, in the sand paintings of the Navajo, and we have witnessed Buddhist priests painting a mandala in sand in the high Himalayas, near Tibet. Standing there in sacred space we realized that we were symbolically connected to everything. Confronted with Van de Bovenkamp's magical forms, the cosmos is present right here—in New York, Kansas City, Miami, or Zurich, even in the secular city with its complex architecture.

Usually Hans is clear about what he is doing, as in the extraordinary meditation temple he designed for Omega Institute. Within this compelling combination of contemplative architecture and interior design, the mind is quieted, the senses soothed—we hear a bell ringing in an empty sky.

A similar sense of purpose visited Hans eight years ago in Bali, where he had three traditional teak and ironwood temples built in order to disassemble them and have them shipped to the US, so he could reassemble the two thousand four hundred pieces by a lake he made on his property. This temple-dwelling has become a tour-de-force of traditional and innovative architectural methods, its buildings nesting like silent witnesses to the surrounding marvels, his own creations, contemporary art, and Buddhist and Hindu objects and deities.

I picture Hans rising like Hephaestus, the Greek divine craftsman, in the early morning sunlight, and beginning to wrest shapes, great or small, out of steel, bronze, and copper. By evening, the hammers, forges and welders are silent. The master sits in his quiet, graceful temple and visits with clients or friends. This man has not only learned how to live well, but how to share well.

As our old friend Joe Campbell said, "Follow your bliss!" and doors will open for you, that you didn't even know were there." It was Campbell at his most artless, simply describing how his own life had worked. Hans Van de Bovenkamp has trod a similar path, underscoring the same principle.

As a young psychologist, I diagnosed Hans with "positive paranoia," the outrageous belief that the universe is conspiring in your favor. Like the core of his being, the truth and clarity of his accomplishment is validated by the blessing of the universe. Hans pitched his table-top up toward the clouds and found a beautiful feast perpetually spread upon it.

BRIEF BIO

Hans Van de Bovenkamp is an architectural designer and a sculptor. He has earned an international reputation over the past 50 years for designing, fabricating, installing and maintaining unique sculptures and fountains in collaboration with architects and designers. His works can be seen in public, civic, corporate and private collections. He has executed over 100 commissions.

ARTIST STATEMENT

"For me, making sculpture is both a spiritual and an artistic act. The studio is my playground, my laboratory, my sanctuary, where I practice and experiment with sculptural ideas. When I am working I am truly living in the present moment: focused and aware of choices as I make them, functioning in an elevated state between the conscious and the subconscious. Over time, I have been fortunate to gather together enough skill and vision to realize my ideas as they have come into my heart. Art for me is a way of life, not just a passion."
